

Kinds of Indian Traditional Clothing for Men

Indian dressing for men has for some time been known to be the most exceptional kinds of dressing for men. Very much like Indian dressing for ladies, there are various sorts of male clothing types and these are identified with the areas that they live in. For instance, a man living in the South of India would wear diverse apparel when contrasted with a man from the North. Here are the three unique kinds of conventional garments for men in India

Dhoti Kurta:

The Dhoti Kurta is the quintessential customary closet for men in India, and is itself worn in various styles in India. Essentially, an individual living in South India would wear it uniquely in contrast to an individual living in North India. The most celebrity to wear a dhoti has been Mahatma Gandhi from India. Now and again, individuals wear a tunic over the dhoti, which is known as the dhoti kurta.

Kurta Pajama:

The Kurta Pajama and the Salwar Kameez can be coupled together, while the dhoti kurta and the saree can be coupled together as comparable clothing. The kurta is essentially a male tunic that is worn over a pajama. It can either be full length or short length, till the abdomen. The full length kurta can be till the lower legs or at times even till the knees.

Lungi:

The Lungi is another significant piece of Indian customary clothing. The lungi is usually worn in places in South India. It is a piece of rectangular material that is worn over the midriff, and is tied. While many would imagine that that the lungi is a sort of casual wear, it isn't the case in many pieces of India. Indeed, even lawmakers, VIPs and so on wear the lungi.

These are the three fundamental kinds of clothing types that an Indian man wears. Obviously, with the evolving times, men have taken to wearing pants and shirts as day by day wear in the metropolitan regions, however these are as yet worn by the more seasoned age.
