U.S. officials said Monday the breach of NATO computer systems was probably an act of cyberwarfare that was not aimed at toppling alliances. In a statement, the Kremlin rejected accusations it was behind the cyberattack, and accused the Obama administration of destabilizing the political situation in the country. A Russian military intelligence unit and a state-sponsored hacker group have been accused of the intrusion. The U.S. intelligence community believes that Russia's military intelligence agency GRU was behind the hacking. The same GRU group has been linked to the cyberattack on the World Anti-Doping Agency. The WADA attack is believed to have allowed hackers to read the names of hundreds of Olympic athletes, which could lead to them being blackmailed by state-sponsored agents.
