milrinone in patients undergoing cardiac surgery. To study the pharmacokinetics of milrinone in patients undergoing cardiac surgery. Randomized prospective controlled trial. Academic teaching hospital. 20 patients undergoing coronary artery bypass surgery. The patients were randomized into two treatment groups: milrinone (0.5 mg/kg loading dose followed by 0.125 mg/kg/min infusion) and placebo. Milrinone blood samples for measurement of plasma concentration were obtained at the following time points: just before treatment, at 2, 10, and 20 minutes after the loading dose, at the end of cardiopulmonary bypass, and at the end of surgery. Arterial blood samples were drawn at the same time points for measurement of the aortic concentration of milrinone. Alveolar-arterial oxygen gradient. Plasma concentration versus time data were evaluated by an open, one-compartment model with first-order elimination for milrinone and a two-compartment model for cardiac output. The data for systemic clearance, volume of distribution, oral clearance, and elimination half-life of milrinone were estimated. The plasma concentration of milrinone in both groups increased significantly from the loading dose to its peak at the end of cardiopulmonary bypass. There were no significant differences in the peak and trough plasma concentrations of milrinone between the two groups. However, the systemic clearance and volume of distribution of milrinone were significantly greater in the placebo group. There was
