Although there are well-documented maternal and fetal complications associated with pregnancy in patients with multiple sclerosis (MS), the association between pregnancy and MS is somewhat controversial. The purpose of this review is to summarize the existing knowledge about the effects of pregnancy on MS, focusing on treatment regimens, maternal complications, and pregnancy outcomes. We also review the literature related to future considerations of these topics. Data from clinical trials, observational studies, and case reports have been reviewed to provide the most current information available. Recent data support the safety of a wide variety of medications, including prednisone, azathioprine, methotrexate, cyclophosphamide, and beta-adrenergic agonists, during pregnancy. Data do not support increased risk of maternal complications in patients with relapsing-remitting MS with use of corticosteroids or cyclophosphamide. There have been an increased number of reports of relapses during pregnancy, particularly during the first trimester. Recent studies and case reports have suggested a possible association of MS with certain pregnancy outcomes. Although there is little definitive data to support this, concerns about perinatal complications in pregnancies of women with MS should be considered..F.R. § 416.921a(b)(2) (1998); see also Williams v. Apfel, 179 F.3d 1066, 1073 (7th Cir.1999) (an ALJ "may draw reasonable inferences from the evidence," but may not arbitrarily disregard evidence). Here, the ALJ's finding that Olufemi was not fully credible is supported by substantial evidence. The record supports the ALJ's finding that Olufemi suffers from generalized anxiety disorder, which is manifested in his extreme fatigue, rather than the sharp pains alleged by Olufemi. The record also
