English: In the meantime, when I was at college, I began to learn how to program in BASIC. These were pre-electronic days, so I did it on a ZX81. In my old math book at the bookstore (I really like this book, but it is no longer there) it has a very basic but very useful program example with BASIC on it and there are sample problems to work with. Unfortunately for me, it is in the German language and I don't know German, but, still, this has given me a good idea of how and where to start with programming. There are a couple of things I have learned, then, that I wish I had known before starting with programming. 1. It isn't about memorizing stuff. It's about understanding, then applying those understandings to create a solution that works. 2. Don't be a nit-wit. Any time you have two ways of doing something in a language, there has to be a third way. The advantage is that you don't waste time with the two other ways you don't use. 3. Don't do things blindly. No matter what language you are programming in, there will be a project you have to do that they will have a course on, or will come up in a class you are taking where you will need to know what they are doing to succeed. 4. Be grateful. When you succeed, your success is theirs too, and this is all I have time for. I apologize for the length. Feel free to use any part of it, but for gosh sakes please attribute to me, gushanitu. Joseph
