The application...There will be a new look on the SDSU gaming boards as Jeffrey Brennan of the Union-Tribune broke the news today that SDSU will be breaking away from San Diego State University and moving to San Diego State University at San Diego. Brennan pointed to the early reaction to the news from students and SDSU football coach Rocky Long as the driving force behind the move. "It appears the students at San Diego State are fed up with being led and told what to do by a bureaucracy that is almost completely disconnected from them," he writes. MOVING TO SANDIEGO State will push San Diego State back to the days when football was king, and that is, of course, not good for SDSU, which has just completed the most successful academic year in its history. From a football perspective, the move is not much of a change. SDSU is no longer known as a major football power and is something of an afterthought in the minds of most college football fans. The move to the second tier did, however, present an opportunity for SDSU to clean up its academic house in the eyes of the NCAA, which continued to monitor the academic situation at SDSU this past season as the school celebrated its all-time winningest football season in school history. It is a highly unusual move for a university to make, and one that will draw mixed reactions from students and alumni. In most sports, in most places, it's a good thing to move up. But in this case, SDSU has achieved the status of a Sun Belt school — a major move up in status that threatens to make San Diego State's football team a bit of a sorry bunch. "I can't think of anyone being happy about it," said longtime San Diego State alumnus Dick Oliver. "I get that that's the way they are doing it, but it doesn't make it better." Brennan noted that SDSU president Elliot Hirshman was "discouraged," by the NCAA's findings and is moving to take care of what's not just
