The present invention relates to a sewing machine with an automatic threading function for the needle. More specifically, the invention relates to a sewing machine with an automatic threading function for the needle wherein the needle thread can be automatically drawn out from a thread package set on a thread supply package located at the back of a sewing machine, and a needle thread is fed by the mechanism or force of a needle threading mechanism having an idle needle and a thread take-up needle. A prior art sewing machine with an automatic threading function for the needle is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 2,909,018. This sewing machine is provided with a driving mechanism for the thread take-up needle so that the thread take-up needle is moved from a thread supply package to the sewing area on the forward side in the sewing machine and is moved back on the forward side in the sewing machine after the thread take-up needle is moved up on the sewing area and the needle thread is fully taken up in the thread take-up needle. The thread take-up needle is rotated by a cylindrical driven gear and the thread take-up needle is reciprocated by a cam plate or cam rod. A problem with a prior art sewing machine having an automatic threading function as described above is that the required driving mechanism and driving mechanism driving force are both large in the length of the thread take-up needle. When an indexing mechanism is used on the forward side of the sewing machine for indexing the needle thread to an unused needle position, the thread take-up needle must be moved in the direction of the indexing cam plate or cam rod on the cam plate moving mechanism on the forward side in the sewing machine. As a result, a large mechanism and a large driving mechanism driving force must be provided. Thus, the apparatus is large and the cost of manufacture is high. Other prior art sewing machines with an automatic threading function for the needle are shown in U.S. Pat. No. 2,803
