Actions of methamphetamine on activity in phrenic nerve and hypoglossal motor neurons in vitro. The actions of methamphetamine (METH) on the spontaneously active neurons of the hypoglossal (XII) nucleus in the rat brain stem slice were studied in vitro. The results of pharmacological analysis and the analyses of recordings from identified hypoglossal motor neurons indicated that METH was not a direct agonist at either dopamine or sigma receptors. The major mechanism underlying the observed actions of METH was the activation of excitatory amino acid neurotransmission. This appeared to be mediated through the release of glutamate from presynaptic terminals of the hypoglossal motoneurons. The findings with METH support the hypothesis that the major action of acute METH is the stimulation of excitatory amino acid neurotransmission in the brain stem. based on quantum noise. As shown in the simulation results, the accuracy of the simulation-based method is inferior to the measurements at room temperature. However, it provides the possibility of the improvement of the accuracy. In this paper, we studied the effects of dielectric constant and temperature on the accuracy of the simulation-based method. For example, the lower the effective dielectric constant of the material for the TE₀₁ mode, the higher the accuracy of the simulation-based method. This may be due to the fact that the high-order modes of the TE₀₁ mode in vacuum have an effect on the electric field of the studied mode. As shown in the results, the effect of the change in the refractive index of the material on the accuracy of the simulation-based method is smaller than that of the change in the dielectric constant. This is due to the fact that the electric field in the studied mode of the dielectric waveguide is more affected by the change in the refractive index than that in the change in the dielectric constant. The influences of the temperature on the accuracy of the simulation-based method is also smaller than that of the change in the dielectric constant. The differences in the accuracy of the simulation-based method according to
