 It says, Converting a string to an integer is considered type conversion I don't understand why since there are no more types being converted than there are being converted in the opposite direction (string --> integer). What is the benefit of doing the conversion when the String is being converted to an integer? A: The conversion occurs because the implicit call to Integer constructor can only be performed if the target type is compatible with the source type (String --> Integer is not a conversion because Integer doesn't extend String). If you don't have that conversion, you have a ClassCastException at runtime. Note that if you explicitly call toString() on the String before calling Integer constructor, there is no error, because there is no longer any implicit conversion (String.toString
