Joong Min Lee Ask HN: Can I use Oauth2 instead of API key? - sideprojectr1 A small side project of mine is trying to export blog post contents to CSV. I am able to provide an API key through API Console, but I would like to move away from this. I plan to store the key in the.env file, but I would like to be able to provide another mechanism for authentication.Is using OAuth2 in place of API key a good idea? What are the potential complications? ===== pwf I would recommend making API key your authentication mechanism and using something like oauth2/oidc to authenticate. ~~~ sideprojectr1 That's what I was trying to figure out. But there seems to be a lot of complications, particularly since the API key is stored in the.env file. ~~~ tylerchappell You can have the API key stored in your dotenv. I use that in one of my current side projects. The only potential issue I see is that you'd be forced to require API key authentication on a number of paths (like the API endpoint). ----- akulbe OAuth/OpenID. It's probably the most common auth method. Advantages: * Provides a long-lived auth token (think one-time use only) * Easy to implement Disadvantages: * Requires a
