Health-related quality of life after a diagnosis of rheumatoid arthritis: a comparison between health-related quality of life instruments in a prospective cohort. To evaluate the health-related quality of life (HRQOL) in patients newly diagnosed with rheumatoid arthritis (RA). Patients aged 18-74 with RA without prior treatment with anti-TNFα agents were recruited at first diagnosis, and HRQOL data were collected prospectively. Patients were followed for 2 years, with a patient-completed questionnaire at baseline and every 12 months. The HRQOL instruments used were the Health Assessment Questionnaire (HAQ), the Rheumatoid Arthritis Quality of Life (RAQoL), the Short Form-36 (SF-36), and the EuroQoL (EQ-5D) instruments. Data were collected from 124 new RA patients. HAQ, RAQoL, and EQ-5D were completed in 94, 88, and 83% of patients at baseline; 94, 79, and 83% of patients completed the questionnaires at follow-up. Fifty-seven percent of the
