Development of the marine teleost Platichthys flesus: Histological changes during embryo and larval development. The marine teleost platichthys flesus, a common commercial fish used for both commercial and scientific purposes, is a major species of importance in developmental biology. By using histology, electron microscopy, immunohistochemistry, laser confocal microscopy, and reverse transcription-polymerase chain reaction, we describe the onset of the larval stage of this fish, from fertilization to hatching. The number of micromeres and nuclei in each micromere is constant during the time that the embryo and larva are developing. Differentiation of individual tissues, including the formation of a tegument, the development of notochord, mesenchyme, and the neural tube, begins with the onset of gastrulation. Interestingly, most of the internal organs are formed by the end of gastrulation. The yolk granules are not fragmented until later
