Various other national, state or private organisations are acting in the same way in order to fulfil the national health targets. The BBC investigated the effect of the new financial arrangements on general practice, finding that it didn't seem to affect how general practitioners treated patients. Instead, the strength of this contract was that the primary care arm of the National Health Service (NHS) was given the final say about which general practices were included in the primary care network. "We have to make a decision about how best to allocate the £350m. We have in the past allocated it in a way that goes along the lines of three broad principles," he said. "It's essential that services don't go out of area; that there are equitable access to services and that we don't spend more on one area than another – and that's the effect of this proposal." Sir Bruce added that the ability of general practices in one area to take on more work because of contract changes was not expected to increase costs significantly. "It isn't a game changer in terms of workload, and it's about keeping the same level of care." In May, Dr Robert Francis, co-chair of the British Medical Association's general practice committee, said that increased funding for general practice could incentivise practices in deprived areas to open in order to benefit from the payment system – that was one of the criticisms of the plan. Robert Francis said: "It's a myth that having a strong primary care system will automatically lead to better health outcomes. "If a practice feels it can get rid of one patient for every eight new patients it gets through the door, and still be financially viable, then it will start to do that. "I think it is a myth that the money is going to be there to support general practice for the needs of patients across the country."
