Physical modeling, modeling a real object, is done in external software, such as using one of many CAD programs that are able to import the same AutoCAD/BRL-CAD DWG/DXF/DWF model file formats. It can also be done in AutoCAD/Inventor. Nested blocks, also known as nested entities, can be used to create a complex drawing hierarchy. They can contain multiple levels of blocks, and can be used to create hierarchies of data. Nested entities can be used to represent the hierarchy of entities, such as the following: Nested blocks containing equipment, which contain objects, which contain blocks that contain equipment, which contain objects, which contain blocks that contain equipment, which contain parts. Joints, which can be used to represent rigid entities. Tool palettes, which are a sub-category of nested entities, used to represent drawing tools. A tree view, a tool that can be used to visualize a tree structure. ACADUS, an extension that allows modelling of architectural structures. CAD to text, allowing creation of notes and saving a drawing as a PDF file, or printing. Launch the software on the top left corner of the screen. But I can't tell if anyone finds it as funny as I do. Republicans don't seem to get it. They can't seem to let go of their anger at a President who occupies the Oval Office and the Congress who is complicit in his rule. They're in a defensive crouch, because he was their victim, but as you know, his offensive methods are having an effect. The last 24 hours have seen a series of embarrassing actions by an administration which is showing up its adversaries as bullies and cowards. First there was the story about Secretary of State Rex Tillerson going to the Pentagon to discuss the Iran nuclear deal with senior military and civilian officials. And then the Secretary of State insulted the President's German counterpart. You see, while Europe is coming to terms with the refugee crisis, the US is, ah, see where this is going? Then there's the low-key but significant episode in which the President made a statement in support of Kurdish rights which angered Turkey, so they shot down a US F-16 fighter jet. Trump called it "a little short" and was careful not to indicate if he thought the Turkish action was justified. Now we have to wait for the finding of facts before the US can even begin to assess the facts on the ground. This is as it should be. But the President did not let up. He tweeted this afternoon that the deal is "insanely bad." "The Iran deal is one of the worst and most one-sided transactions the United States has ever entered into. Frankly, that deal is an embarrassment to the United States, and I don't think you've heard the last of it, believe me." That's about as close as we've ever come to saying that he intends to destroy the deal, which is very close to suggesting that he believes that it's already too late to salvage it, as I've been arguing.
