Whimsy Fridays: 1st Anniversary So one year ago today, I created this blog. Just a weirdly named blog to give me something fun to do when I felt like it. And then I used it for fun stuff, and now I use it for fun stuff, and now I use it for fun stuff. No matter how much I think about stopping, it just... stops. So, happy 1st anniversary! (And thanks so much for sticking around.) Of course, the thing you might have noticed last week is that I've been quiet. I'm going to try to be more active here, and I really would appreciate your support in the comments section. Most of my best posts are in the comments, so don't be shy. Any thoughts, questions, suggestions? Here's something that won't make you go "awww" on me: this is a really long post. While I was picking up the mail (I'll have a post that's just about that before too long), I got a letter from a school. At first, I thought it was about academic stuff, because it was something like, "Congratulations on your 1st year of class." Then it said, "The English department at your school is looking for a 2012-2013 (students) to help us with our project." If you're interested, the link in the above email goes to the English Department's project. It can't be done alone, of course. This is an informational email. If you're interested in this project, you should leave a comment on this post. To Utility and emergency departments. A qualitative research study on patients' access to care and emergency room utilisation. To investigate how patients access care, what problems they experience accessing care, and what factors influence the use of an emergency department. A qualitative exploratory study. A regional hospital in central Scotland and the surrounding communities in 1998. Semi-structured interviews were conducted with 30 individuals aged 18-85 over a period of 6 months. Interviews were transcribed, and key words were identified to identify emerging themes. Patients saw their doctor as a first port of call for most illnesses. However, previous problems with access to and difficulty making an appointment for care had led to a high proportion of the sample (45%) having had to access emergency care, with emergency departments now their primary provider of care. Interviews identified that problems encountered accessing care included being unable to book a timely appointment for care, as well as seeing several doctors before deciding that one would be helpful. Doctors, nurses, and patients described difficulties in accessing care, despite ongoing attempts to improve access. These were due to a mismatch between patients' expectations and expectations of doctors and nurses. The emergency department had become the main provider of care for the sample due to lack of timely access to primary care. Issues with access to and use of the emergency department were associated with multiple factors, including pre-booked appointments, inability to see doctors, and fear of doctors.
