television platform, also known as a distribution platform, is a kind of broadcast transmission and distribution infrastructure used to deliver television programming, advertising, and data streams to users. The term "television platform" is also used to refer to a computer system used to create television content. Usage

Television platforms can be thought of as the "glue" of the television broadcasting industry. In practice, they are the backbone of the industry: most countries' national television networks operate from a single nationwide television network system, and most television networks globally operate from a single television platform. At the same time, the use of television platforms is rapidly evolving and is changing. With the advent of technologies such as IPTV and social television, the role of television platforms is transforming, as is the way in which the industry uses them.

History The term platform originally referred to the stepping stones of a Viking warship. A platform was the first or lowest deck to be loaded with a certain type of armor. The term has now been transferred to suit the needs of the media industry: the steps the industry has to take to keep up with the pace of digitalization.

Etymology Origins of the term The term was first used around 1931 in reference to a radio station in Tacoma, Washington in the United States. In a letter to the editor of the local newspaper, "The Tacoma News" on 18 November 1931, Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company co-founder George Westinghouse stated, "The Tacoma station (KOWW) has been experimenting with a new medium, and we are unable to install the proper antenna atop its roof. So we are trying a coaxial aerial which we hope to install in a few weeks. This device is a sort of 'broadcasting platform' or 'walking stick'...in a way, it is the foundation of

Explore the Collections Philadelphia Museum of Art: Handbook of the Collections Created as a counterpart to the Museum's film, A History of the Pre-Columbian World: From 3000 B.C. to A.D. 1500, this video, available on the web and shown in the museum's new Gallery 24, combines traditional art historical methods with innovative techniques in cinema. This collection of sixty artifacts is based on the Museum's Peabody Expedition and its newly discovered Tlatilco culture, one of the most important pre-Columbian cultures in the western hemisphere. The Peabody Expedition, which began in 1921, resulted in the discovery of the largest and best-preserved prehistoric aboriginal ruins in Mexico, revealing a complex civilization for which the Aztec and Maya are only pale reflections. In the video, the museum's curators explain the significance of each artifact and discuss the history and cultural background of the people who made them. There can be no doubt that this magnificent photograph is authentic. The clothing, especially the vestments, was worn by the pre-Columbian priest and represents the best-preserved example of native Mexican dress. Mr. Andrade says that the history of the region in which this artifact was discovered is that the area was inhabited by more than 100 different cultural groups, including the Aztecs and the Maya. This region, in southwestern and central Mexico, has been called the Valley of Mexico, for it is covered by a complex network of alluvial valleys. These valleys, including the Valley of Mexico, are in one of the most
