Q: How to add a paiement button to html text So I have a static html page called "page.html" The text in this page is "Paypal Account" How can i format this so that if users login to paypal they can press the "PAY" button that comes with it and the paypal text changes to "PAYNOW" Thanks for your help :) A: It will depend on how your site is built. If you're using a hosted ecommerce solution, you might look into an extension you can install on your site, or the API endpoint for paypal. If you're using a script on your own site, you'll need to look into how the payment system works on the server. Since you didn't specify what you're running I can't be more specific. Edit to update based on comment The way I use paypal is to have a page on my site show what you want, but every page on the site has a price tag of 1$ or whatever, and then have it direct to paypal, where you set the price and price total and have it accept the transaction. Archives When it comes to the best suppliers in the industry, it is prudent to make sure that you are dealing with the right ones. There are plenty of companies out there that can provide you with the benefits of a reliable company, but all that is does for you is to jeopardize the reputation of the company. You need a company that is trusted, and is known for its exceptional services. Discover the benefits of using a company with a strong reputation. When it comes to reputation, the first thing that you will see is that the company will have the highest ratings. This shows that the company has not been in business for that long, and does not have a history of bad experiences. It goes on to say that the company is reliable and maintains a clean work environment. It is always beneficial to have a company where the workers are well-educated and trained. The higher your workers are, the more likely it is that they will tend to bring forth the benefits of the customer. It is always good to have a company that holds worker seminars. It is beneficial because it will help you to know the best of the workers. It will also help you to know if they are professional or if they are just making good use of the time. If you want to find a

it is the result of class conflict, not as a natural result of economic development. Class conflicts are not unrelated to debates about inequality and economic development, but they are mostly confused with them. Some people will argue that the international rise in income inequality is caused by social cleavages, as inequality increased because of economic reforms. This is wrong. Yes, the story of the last three decades is one of a rise in the wage share of the global capitalist class, but not because of a simple rise in inequality because of social cleavages. In fact, in countries like the United States the wage share of the global capitalist class actually declined, because of a rise in inequality. The second theme of the mainstream position on inequality, is that income inequality has changed because the standard of living of the workers has increased. The famous chart, which shows how high-income people have gotten wealthier over the past 30 years, tends to be seen as the most sympathetic portrayal of the mainstream. But the standard of living of most workers didn't grow much over the past three decades, and certainly has not grown since the financial crisis. Most workers have not gotten richer. They are getting poorer and more insecure. The basic position of the mainstream, that rising inequality is the result of a rise in the standard of living of the capitalist class, ignores the massive social effect of rising inequality. As Matthew Bishop and Alan Manning found, inequality hurts society. It is the result of a process of social reproduction, in which the low wages, low education and poor health of workers have a deeply negative impact on other aspects of the capitalist economy. The most important consequence of this is the problems workers face after their working lives are over. That is why, overall, inequality has grown while the after-tax incomes of ordinary Americans have stagnated. As David Autor and Lawrence Katz found, most of the growth in after-tax incomes has come not from increased pay for low-paid workers, but from increased pay for high-paid workers. In fact, inequality has increased the amount that workers pay in taxes. And it has done so at a time of mass austerity and cuts to public services that have lowered the standard of living of millions of Americans. So the main question of what has caused growing inequality in the United States is not how the standard of living of working people has changed, but what has happened to their wages. It's not very difficult to find answers to this question, since
