Features:Q: Can a thread pool handle that much data? I have an issue where I want to handle a peak load of about 50 gigabytes of data per minute. Is a thread pool the right thing to use and how many threads would be a good number? A: You can use a thread pool to do anything that a process does. Thread pools are often used when you do computations. In that case your thread pool can take requests from an asynchronous method. e.g. protected void btnCalculate_Click(object sender, EventArgs e) { ThreadPool.QueueUserWorkItem(o=>DoCalculation()); } protected void DoCalculation() { var myModel = o.Input; var myResult = o.Result; // do calculations here } When the result is ready to pass to another thread pool you can: var myResult = DoCalculation(); ThreadPool.QueueUserWorkItem(o=>Results.Add(myResult)); However, if you were doing this data analysis you would want something more specific, for instance the MapReduce framework is good for this. A: Any multithreaded application is going to have one or more threads at full CPU
