Bilateral internal carotid stenting: is the decision to carry out bilateral endarterectomy justified? The authors present their experience with 98 carotid interventions in 87 patients. Eight cases (8%) were treated by a second intervention, five because of the neurological complication of the first intervention and three because of the lack of neurological symptoms. One further patient suffered an increase of the neurological deficit and one a stroke; the last three patients were without focal neurological symptoms. Of the overall series of 98 interventions, 81 were performed for symptomatic and 17 for asymptomatic stenoses. In 16 cases (16.3%) carotid endarterectomy was performed in conjunction with a coronary bypass; one death was recorded in this group of patients. Twenty-three percent of all carotid endarterectomy (26/121) in the series were associated with coronary surgery. The authors conclude that when the occurrence of a second stroke is an increasing possibility, the decision to carry out a second intervention for a carotid stenosis should be taken with extreme caution.
