An exploded view of the part of the female is shown. The female includes a base, a first pressing member, a second pressing member and a film and the first and second pressing members are integrally formed. The base has a first opening and a second opening and the first opening has a first surface, a second surface opposite to the first surface and a first slit. The first surface has an upper surface portion and a lower surface portion extending therebetween. The second pressing member is mounted to the upper surface portion. The second pressing member is formed having a first surface and a second surface opposite to the first surface. The first surface is larger than the second surface and faces the first surface of the base. The first pressing member presses the upper surface portion. The second pressing member presses the lower surface portion. The pressing members deform the base elastically. The first slit is disposed on the first surface, and the second slit is disposed on the second surface. An opening of the first slit and an opening of the second slit have a same width. The present invention relates to a method for determining the thickness of a biological sample and, more particularly, to a method for determining the thickness of a biological sample by using an infrared light beam transmitted from a portion of the biological sample and obliquely incident on a position of a reference surface of the biological sample. An optical fiber is very useful in measuring the thickness of various kinds of samples, particularly biological samples, for example, blood, gel, etc. For this reason, it has been proposed to use an infrared light beam transmitted from a portion of a biological sample together with an infrared light beam transmitted from a reflection surface of the biological sample in measuring the thickness of the biological sample. For example, in a method disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,301,765, the thickness of a sample, for example, blood, is measured by using two infrared light beams, one transmitted from a portion of the blood sample and the other transmitted from a reflection surface of the blood sample. In this method, the thickness of the blood sample is determined by comparing the intensity of the infrared light beam transmitted from the portion of the blood sample with the intensity of the infrared light beam transmitted from the reflection surface. However, the method disclosed in the above-identified patent has several disadvantages. First, since there is a considerable difference between the intensity of the infrared light beam from the portion of the sample which is directly transmitted from the sample and the intensity of the infrared light beam from the

The new Phalaenopsis plant is a product of a planned breeding program conducted by the inventor in Bleiswijk, The Netherlands. The objective of this breeding program was to create a new Phalaenopsis plant with numerous attractive and large, red, fully recurved flowers, suitable for potted plant production. The new Phalaenopsis plant 'PHALAG01' is a cross-bred product of a cross made in March 2005 between a proprietary female Phalaenopsis plant designated 'UCHINO-KISEKI' (unpatented) and a proprietary male Phalaenopsis plant designated 'KISS-ALLRED' (U.S. Plant Pat. No. 15,874). The female parent (seed parent) plant was grown from a plantlet created by grafting in September 2003 in Bleiswijk, The Netherlands, by the inventor, using 'UCHINO-KISEKI' (unpatented) as the rootstock and 'CYCLONE-WATSUDA' (unpatented) as the scape stock. The cross was made at a greenhouse in Bleiswijk, The Netherlands by hobby growers. The new Phalaenopsis plant 'PHALAG01' was discovered and selected by the
