this study was to describe evaluation processes to define and guide social intervention in a community of the northern region of Brazil. The study consisted of a qualitative approach in which twenty rural families were chosen by social mapping. Semi-structured interviews with key informants were recorded and transcribed. Data were submitted to a thematic content analysis, using a textual-interpretive approach. Two evaluation processes were identified: community evaluation and individual evaluation. The first begins with identification of problems and promotion of social involvement to identify and solve them. The second requires discussion about the problems, their solutions and the prioritization of interventions. To evaluate health, a comparison with national and state indicators is suggested. This study has highlighted the validity of community evaluation and has contributed to understanding the evaluation process in health. This was done by understanding the way it functions as a tool to identify social problems and develop appropriate actions, which will ensure the community participation in planning, implementation and evaluation of health

actions.Q: Нужна
