In mid-February, Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau and a group of other world leaders will gather for the One Planet Summit in Paris, a summit that poses a unique set of problems for the Canadian prime minister. First, because it's based in Paris, the summit will be a convenient place for protesters to make their voices heard. They're free to do so, and they'll have no fear of arrest, thanks to the French authorities' agreement to grant them legal protection. Second, a convenient place for other world leaders, such as China, to make their voices heard. In fact, I suspect that's one of the reasons some of the leaders won't attend. China's vision for the world is that it leads, and the rest follow, and that's not a vision that many leaders are willing to embrace, except in the abstract. A co-ordinated protest like the one planned for World Heritage Day on Feb. 23, which is exactly what it sounds
