Sometimes, such anti-rocking coupling is needed in order to ensure that the coupling does not rock, which in turn may cause the suspension arm to rock with respect to the vehicle frame. Such prior art devices are quite costly and thus, automotive vehicle manufacturers prefer to reduce the use of anti-rocking couplings in their vehicles. One of the most prevalent types of anti-rocking couplings is one using rollers that are each in rolling contact with each other. To prevent the rollers from sliding relative to one another, such anti-rocking couplings often use a ball joint with the rollers attached thereto.
