Overall, what you see in the video is what you will be able to play in the game. The only thing you will not be able to play is the aspect of how you will feel playing FIFA 22. The video highlights the animation changes, which will help the movements of players and make them appear more realistic and natural. For example, Thierry Henry (FIFA 20) in the video used in the video, moving players together as one will also appear in FIFA 22. "We're constantly trying to improve upon what's new and unseen in the game," said Jeff Stratton, game director. "As far as the animation, I think we have some very cool changes. For example, players interacting with each other. If you watch the video, two midfielders are holding each other, and then they end up playing a nice ball together, and those actions look 100% correct, even though they're in 2D. We've got new animations we can do in our engine, and we're adding new ways to animate players, and we're just trying to deliver on what we're saying we can deliver." There's more than meets the eye to what EA Sports is showcasing here. The focus on motion capture and its use in gameplay is a key part of FIFA 22. In our previous article, we spoke about how EA Sports is using this technology, and how the company sees it as the next step for players. "The technology is being developed and refined on FIFA 18, and we're pushing the envelope in terms of where it can go," said Dan Ettinger, general manager at EA Sports. "To take it to the next level, we believe we need to use this technology in the game itself. We are adding the kind of power you see in gameplay, and apply the same animation to it. It's a bit of physics, a bit of Naughty Dog in terms of how we're working with these new tools." In our exclusive interview with EA Sports, we explored how the team came up with the idea of adding motion capture to FIFA games, and what the potential for this technology is. Initiating the Idea EA Sports began with the FIFA Community team to search for the next big concept. With the trust of the FIFA community, the idea of adding motion capture to the game was born. "We're looking for
