Doc Merge

Doc Merge is a very fast application that can merge two or more documents with no fuss. Only a few seconds are needed to figure out the purpose of each tool, but Doc Merge already provides helpful information in every single window. The whole application comes down to the file selection process because users are required to input the documents they wish to merge from the get go. DOC, DOCX, DOT and DOTX formats are supported, with two different file selection modes: drag and drop support or the “Add Doc” button in the main window. The way documents are arranged in the file queue also represents the order the text shall appear in the output document, so dedicated buttons to move a selected item up or down are also available. One very handy option allows users to use a page break to separate text content, which is strongly recommended especially when working with multiple documents. Doc Merge performs the whole process in just a few seconds, but the overall time needed to complete the task also depends on the size of each document. The app works flawlessly on all Windows versions and uses only a moderate amount of hardware resources in the process. All things considered, Doc Merge does its job very well and doesn’t offer any unnecessary feature. It requires just basic computer knowledge and although it has no dedicated help section, the intuitive and user-friendly GUI definitely helps a lot. Buy it Now

Q: How do I load an actual image onto a UIImageView using Objective-C I am trying to load an actual image onto the UIImageView using Objective-C. This is on the simulator, but the actual device will be an iPod Touch 5th generation. Here is the code I am using (I am sure that I am forgetting something simple but I cannot figure out what it is):

```
-(void)viewDidLoad {
    [super viewDidLoad]; UIImageView *imageView1 = [[UIImageView alloc] initWithImage:[UIImage imageNamed:@"Cheese"]]; imageView1.frame = CGRectMake(0, 0, 320, 480); [self.view addSubview:imageView1]; } A: This code makes the imageView fit the image with the top, left corner being the center of the image:
UIView *imageView = [[UIView alloc] initWith

What's New In Doc Merge?

Simple, clean and intuitive, as the name suggests, Doc Merge is an application focused on merging multiple documents. The tool supports a batch-mode and the application also allows users to add a second document to the batch via the Add Doc button located in the main window, which comes in handy for creating multiple document clones. When two or more documents are selected the Merge Wizard begins. Users are required to input the documents they wish to merge from the get go and the process is pretty much straightforward. The entire process takes less than five seconds to finish, though the main window takes longer to load. Users are presented with a clickable toolbar with helpful tools, such as the Text Window, Text Attachments, the Page Breaks and the Content Box. Selecting the Batch and Add Doc buttons in the main window allows users to start a new batch or add a new document, respectively, and clicking on the toolbar icon in the same row will move the selected item up or down in the list. The Merge Wizard includes a helpful tab called "Basic" which allows users to set a number of parameters that are usually required when merging, like the format used in the output document, the page break order and formatting features that come in handy when working with multiple documents. Doc Merge Features: Despite its simple appearance, the tool offers a number of useful features when it comes to merging multiple documents. The application supports all supported file formats (DOC, DOCX, DOT and DOTX) and the implementation is simply brilliant, as all files merge seamlessly into one in record time. At the time of this review, the application is in a beta stage and while the download link is no longer active, if you go to the application's support forum you can find a working download. When the application starts you are greeted with a screen that introduces the user to the Merge Wizard and asks for more information. For example, selecting the Format drop-down menu and choosing WORD then saves the resulting document in the same format as the original document. This process also shows the nature of the output document in the title of the Merge Wizard screen. The application has a batch mode that makes it possible to add multiple documents to the list. Clicking on the Add Doc button located in the main window will display a new document in the file queue and even though a second document isn't a requirement, this functionality can come in handy if users want to create multiple file copies of the
