Active AIDS education in South Carolina: impact on knowledge and testing. In 1989 a community-based AIDS education program was initiated in South Carolina to test the effectiveness of a program that has focused on improving knowledge and reducing HIV testing reluctance. With a pretest, posttest design, program materials were presented in an adult class format with no booster sessions. In a previous study, class attendees showed a decrease in HIV testing reluctance from 55.6% to 25.7% of the baseline survey group. There was no change in knowledge scores. To assess the impact of the program on prevention behaviors, the fall retention rate was investigated. Of the 18 enrolled classes, 32% were enrolled in fall 1989, 37

Film is not at all an objective medium. The communication of ideas by means of images is a matter of perceptions and opinions, and is therefore the more difficult to pin down the greater is the freedom of expression and the variations in the messages. Narrative films can give the audience an understanding of an historical event, a political event, a scientific phenomenon or a cultural event. The features of these film-narratives are the same as those of novels, plays, or the history essay. They are made up of images and sound. The real story can be told in different ways; for example, the short story is not a continuous narrative, but consists of a succession of images, that is, usually two or three images. A film can be said to be in film form, if it represents a succession of images; that is, it is made up of one or more continuous sequences. Film-narratives vary from one type to another according to their length and to the length of the sequences they make up. Short films have a narrative duration of between three and four minutes, and a sequence lasting about a minute; for example, the ceremony at the crossing of the Latin American and Greek Olympic games. The more long film-narratives can be divided into consecutive sequences which run for up to three hours. In the longer films, the narrative can be divided into several sequences, with each one having a duration of between one and three hours. Thus, for example, the film Anastasia (1956), told the tale of the life of the Russian princess
