New research shows that web-based interventions for young people with diabetes can be successfully delivered to a wide range of socio-economic groups. The research also found that young people with diabetes reported the highest levels of confidence in their ability to self-manage their diabetes. The research, which included a non-randomised control group, was conducted with young people (aged 5–18 years) with diabetes, in two east London localities. Participants were randomly assigned to one of four conditions: access to a web-based programme to help them manage their diabetes; a pamphlet describing the same programme; access to a pedometer; or access to a pedometer but no programme. The study also investigated whether these web-based interventions were successful when delivered on a range of socio-economic levels and identified where weaknesses in people's use of the internet might be preventing successful uptake of online interventions. After 12 weeks, web-based intervention participants reported significant reductions in their blood glucose and HbA1c, with comparable reductions reported in the pamphlet group. The pedometer group showed a significant reduction in HbA1c, but not in blood glucose. There was also a significant difference in the blood glucose and HbA1c levels between the pedometer and no intervention conditions, with the intervention group showing the lowest levels of both. Self-management ability Participants also reported high levels of confidence in their ability to self-manage their diabetes. Participants in the web-based programme group reported the highest levels of confidence and this was significantly higher than the confidence levels reported by those in the pamphlet or pedometer conditions. Trust in healthcare professionals and the provision of family support was generally low. However, participants in the pedometer and no intervention conditions rated these factors higher than those in the web-based or pamphlet condition. Participants with higher levels of socio-economic status were not found to be more likely to access online diabetes-related information than those with lower socio-economic status. "We have demonstrated that it is possible to deliver a web-based programme for young people with diabetes to a wide range of populations and it is encouraging that participants are so positive about the effectiveness of the tool," said lead researcher Dr Eileen Allen, senior lecturer in child health at King's College London. "The fact that the participants with the highest confidence in their ability to self-manage their diabetes were in TALLAHASSEE, Fla. (AP) – A former East Coast regional director of the National Rifle Association has pleaded not guilty to federal charges of fraud and conspiracy, following a grand jury investigation into the gun group's tax-exempt status. Federal prosecutors allege that Christopher Cox, 62, failed to file tax records detailing the organization's finances between 2002 and 2016. A lawyer for Cox didn't immediately respond Friday to telephone and email messages seeking comment. Cox previously worked as a tax consultant with Price Waterhouse LLP and served as NRA Region 4 Director, based in Palm Beach, Fla. According to a criminal complaint, in 2012, the Internal Revenue Service notified the NRA that it was under investigation for possible tax violations. The NRA's former tax counsel, Scott Levi, later told investigators that Cox had not filed the NRA's tax documents despite telling Levi he would do so. "You are my son, and you're a liar," Cox allegedly replied to Levi, during a 2012 phone conversation, according to the complaint. The NRA's tax-exempt status has been in question since shortly after former executive Wayne LaPierre was hired in 2005. The Washington Post has reported that Levi provided inaccurate information about his "loyalties" to the NRA to the Treasury Department. The NRA's chief lobbyist, Chris Cox, was until recently the group's chief executive officer but is now in a federal prison in Virginia for obstruction and conspiracy in a scheme to conceal payments to a top NRA official to buy his silence regarding an investigation. Richard Feldman, the NRA's current chief lobbyist, admitted to accepting $50,000 in 2015 to keep him from cooperating with a federal investigation into whether the NRA illegally coordinated with politicians.
