I'm more interested in manufacturing a few things for the next month or two and then applying for YC - that doesn't really seem like a lot to ask from them. (Or, "I want a $15k to build a prototype of an idea, go into YC, and get $500k of funding" is probably more appropriate) ~~~ bwahb OK. My point is that it doesn't seem like a lot to ask. That is, if you are going to be spending over $20k to start, I'm not sure why you would want to invest in this relationship. What I think you mean is, "you are not interested in gaining VC funding for something you can make", but your "why not" here doesn't make sense to me. Anyways, hopefully my answer helped a little :) ~~~ psaintla I'm sorry if I didn't explain my point very clearly; I

Photoshop Elements is available on a wide range of platforms from Mac and Windows to Linux, and on Android and iOS. Anyone can use it. This guide is intended for anyone interested in using Elements and doesn't come with the photo editing experience of the professional version. It is intended as a beginner's tool for editing photos and sharing them online. It's a suitable place for newbies to start their journey with Photoshop Elements. This guide is meant as a replacement for the Adobe Elements document that comes with the program. If you would like to learn more about Photoshop Elements, see our guide about how to get started with it. Since we only cover photo editing features, we don't cover installation or any other programs needed to take photos or even have access to a computer. This guide covers: Software and hardware requirements What to do first Installing And most importantly... How to use the elements The majority of this guide is to help you get set up on your computer and a basic understanding of how to use the software. You should take a look at our previous posts, if you are a novice or need further help. Adobe Photoshop Elements is available for free. Prevention of Clostridium difficile infection in the intensive care unit. To prospectively evaluate the effectiveness of three potential strategies in prevention of Clostridium difficile infection (CDI). Prevention strategies were compared against a "no strategy" approach. The study was conducted in two intensive care units (ICUs) at Harborview Medical Center, Seattle, Washington. Consecutive patients admitted to the study ICUs were monitored for CDI for 8 weeks. Strategies for prevention of CDI included non-conferral of exclusive antibiotics, non-conferral of proton-pump inhibitors and preferential administration of antibiotics with "good" in vitro activity for both Gram-positive and Gram-negative organisms (vancomycin, third-generation cephalosporins) and avoidance of fluoroquinolone monotherapy. The no-strategy approach included selective non-conferral of penicillins and tetracyclines. Concomitant therapies were recorded at the time of tracheal tube placement and at the time of antibiotic administration. No patients (0/60) developed CDI while on non-conferral-of-penicillins and tetracyclines strategy, while 9/78 patients developed CDI while on non-conferral of proton-pump inhibitors ( $P = 0.0006$ ). Five of the 9 CDI patients were classified as having "community-acquired" CDI. Three additional patients had criteria for "community-acquired" CDI, but after a community-acquired outbreak was identified. None of the patients with CDI had been in contact with an inpatient with CDI. Patients who received antibiotics with "good" in vitro activity for Gram-positive and Gram-negative organisms had a significantly lower rate of CDI compared to those who received fluoroquinolone monotherapy. This approach was used in 31 of 78 patients and was associated with a 55% lower rate of CDI compared to non-conferral of proton-pump inhibitors alone ( $P = 0.014$ ). These results demonstrate that even with universal prophylaxis, the rate of CDI was significantly lower than previously reported from ICUs. Vancomycin as the preferred agent for empiric therapy of the ICU patient was associated with a lower rate of CDI than conventional "first-generation" cephalosporins.[Thyroid hormone levels in men of the

Recently a number of companies around the world have introduced innovative wireless charging systems that allow devices to be charged wirelessly without having to be paired with a charging pad or physically connect to a power outlet. In a first generation of charging systems, for example, a transmitter is placed on one device and a receiver is placed on another device to be charged, and electromagnetic fields are generated to transfer power to the receiver to charge it. In another embodiment, a transmitter is placed on a first device and emits a first electromagnetic field, and a receiver is placed on a second device and receives this first field to charge the second device. Wireless charging can reduce a user's inconvenience by requiring fewer components, such as the case of requiring a charging pad or plug, and also can be more compact, depending on how the transmitter and receiver are placed relative to each other. In order to maximize the efficiency of these charging systems, they rely on inductive coupling and magnetic induction. Inductive coupling is a physical phenomenon where one conductor is placed near another conductor and a current or magnetic field is induced in the adjacent conductor. In particular, the current or magnetic field induced in the adjacent conductor is proportional to the rate at which the current flows in the first conductor and inversely proportional to the distance between the two conductors. This current/magnetic field is called the near field. The current/magnetic field in the receiver thus generates a magnetic field that interacts with the transmitter's magnetic field via the near field, resulting in power transfer. The amount of energy that is transferred between the two magnetic fields is a function of a coupling coefficient between the two conductors and of the amplitude and frequency of the currents or magnetic fields in the two conductors. Wireless charging systems work in the near field which is approximately in the range between 0 mm and 100 mm. In order to more efficiently charge a device within this range, wireless charging systems have used coils to generate and receive the magnetic fields, and also to detect the position of the device relative to the transmitter. For example, U.S. Patent Application Publication No. 2010/0312825 describes using multiple coils to generate and receive the magnetic fields, and using multiple coils to detect the position of the device relative to the transmitter. These multiple coils are arranged at a fixed
