S.F. punishes U. of San Francisco for rejecting anti-porn ad The university faces a $10,000 fine for its refusal to run the ad. A local businessman and his girlfriend were arrested in the early morning of Dec. 16 after they spray-painted anti-pornography advertisements on the facade of the University of San Francisco, police said. SAN FRANCISCO (CBS 5) — The University of San Francisco faces a $10,000 fine for refusing to run an anti-pornography ad next to the dorm where the man arrested for defacing a school's facade with anti-pornography messages recently lived. The university is appealing a state Supreme Court decision last month that affirmed a punishment of $10,000 for refusing to run the advertisement. The local businessman and his girlfriend were arrested in the early morning of Dec. 16. Police say at 5:42 a.m. a woman who lived at the university's Hayes Hall reported seeing a graffiti-message on the face of the building which said: "Nasty Harass," "Anti-Pornography," and "Free Speech." The woman later told police she saw a man and a woman matching the description spray-painting a message on the building the night before. After learning of the incident, the university learned that the woman who reported the vandalism had been staying at Hayes Hall. Police say the man arrested was the girlfriend of the woman who had been staying at Hayes. During the search, police allegedly found drugs in the woman's possession and also found anti-pornography messages in the woman's bag, including notes saying "Anti-Pornography" and "Porn Kills" at her dorm. Police said the man and woman were booked on several counts, including felony vandalism. They were later released on their own recognizance. Joseph Susco was the university's interim director of media relations during the investigation. During the incident, he said the university was able to remove the graffiti using a "specially designed cleaning agent" that made the message's lines visible for a short time, before it was covered over. "Our cleaning agent only removed it for a matter of seconds, and the anti-pornography messages appear only to those with a sensitive eye," that people with down syndrome are an important group because they have a disability, but have the natural potential to live, laugh and enjoy life just like the rest of us. They are completely unique and vital members of our community. Those with Down syndrome have been an important part of my personal and professional life. When I was a first-grade teacher in the suburbs of Philadelphia, I had just graduated from a one-on-one education course. I was teaching a very bright but very disobedient boy named Chris; and one day, just as I was about to hit him for the second time, he whispered that he was having a down day. He had dropped his book, forgotten to eat his lunch, and was in a complete and total dither. I picked up his book and thumbed through it. In the front I found a poem called "Tree Leaves" by a teacher named Sue Wheeler. It was about the habits of trees. All of a sudden, I thought, "I know a kid like this!" I was very pleased with the poem and thought it was very appropriate. I dropped it back in the book and put it on Chris's desk. When I did, he started to cry. He began to cry from the deepest, most real sense of loss. He said, "Why, why did you take my book away? Chris can't have this!" I hadn't meant to hurt him. I had only meant to cheer him up. It's similar to what I do now. I have a chance to help people without their permission, without their knowledge, and without their consent. But I insist that I am doing it, not by choice, but because they are needy and because I am a realist. I can't pretend I don't know what people really want from me. I run my foundation by this principle: If I don't know, ask. This motto has worked very well for me. My first real job was at the State Department. I was the youngest hiring clerk in the entire division. I had applied for the job at age 16, a year after I finished college. At one time, I was the youngest hiring clerk in the entire division. I realized that not only did I have a personal and professional interest in this job, but I also realized that the majority of people in the U.S. need jobs. I needed a job. I wanted to do what I had done in college
