This is not the first time that players have been utilised in the creation of gameplay data. We asked two of our editors to give their thoughts on how player data will be used to power FIFA gameplay and what they think of FUT. FIFA 22 will feature a range of player models in addition to the existing player models in the previous FIFA 17, FIFA 18, and FIFA 19 games. EA Sports used the input of players when designing the new player models for FIFA 22. "We've seen a lot of progression this year in terms of the fidelity of the players that we have on offer," executive producer Peter Moore told Gamespot in September. "Previously, we've had different player models in previous editions of the game. So, this year, we've really got more than we've had in terms of virtual human players for the previous editions. We've got multiple different types of faces, more than we've ever had. We've got a lot of different types of animations. And, of course, we have speed." "When you get the opportunity to work with our players and get them on board and involve them to help design these guys, you really get to know them." "We've got heads which are inspired by real people. And when you get the opportunity to work with our players and get them on board and involve them to help design these guys, you really get to know them. It's really interesting to see what's going on in their heads, so you really end up with unique, authentic game characters," Moore told Gametrailers in August. "We've seen from our players that the newer players we've added in this year are just like real-life players." "So, we're hearing from them that they're getting more confident and they're performing in real-life better. And also, we've seen that since we've added players like Gareth Bale, the way they now express themselves in games." "We're always learning, right? And in FIFA - FIFA is about taking the learnings that we get from our players and applying it to gameplay. It means it's gonna sound familiar, it's gonna feel familiar, but
