class serializable include datamapper def data serializer.serialize(self) end def serialize serializer.serialize(self, uuid: 'unused') end end os plus 4.0 cubo sistemas serial use of the @serialized-object is not required, and some developers argue that one should not explicitly define a uuid. this is due to the fact that some uuids are not unique. an example is a uuid that contains a timestamp. because timestamps are generated by the operating system, not the program that generates them, two instances of the same timestamp will have the same uuid. as mentioned in the original post, it is the responsibility of the programmer to ensure that a uuid is unique. class serializable include datamapper def data serializer.serialize(self) end def serialize serializer.serialize(self, uuid: 'a custom uuid') end end os plus 4.0 cubo sistemas serial this is a common problem with serializers. they are only as good as the programmer who wrote them. if there is no versioning then any process that de-serializes the object will receive an invalid object. in our example below, we have a simple class that is nothing more than a wrapper around the serialized data, so we don't have to worry about versioning the serialized object. if you plan to save and retrieve multiple instances of the same object, you must ensure that the serialized object has a unique uuid associated with it. class serializable include datamapper def data serializer.serialize(self) end def serialize serializer.serialize(self, uuid: 'custom uuid') end end os plus 4.0 cubo sistemas serial este es un error común con los serializadores. son tan buenos como el programador que los escribió. si no hay una versión, ningún proceso que deserializa el objeto será capaz de asignar un valor adecuado a la clave. en nuestro ejemplo de abajo, notar que a diferencia de los serializadores que mencionamos en la respuesta original, aquí no necesitamos definir un uuid.

however, in the case of a heterogeneous structure, the actual mathematical structure of the serialized object is most probably not that of the structurally simplest type that is included in the object. for instance, when a serializable class includes another serializable class, the serialized form of the first class will almost certainly include fields that only refer to the second class. the serialization runtime will not be able to detect these errors when it performs the serialization operation. to solve this problem, the serialization runtime is able to detect such errors and raise an exception. the following section discusses the use of additional classes in serializable classes. if a serializable class extends from another serializable class, or includes another serializable class, the serialized form of the class will almost certainly include fields that only refer to the extension classes. the serialization runtime is able to detect these errors when it performs the serialization operation. to solve this problem, the serialization runtime is able to detect such errors and raise an exception. public class x { private static x m; public static void init(serializer ser) throws IOException { ser.reset(); ser.readObject(this); } public static void writeObject(serializer ser, x o) throws IOException { ser.writeObject(o); } public void foo() { //.. } } os plus 4.0 cubo sistemas serial for the same reason, i would say you should not use jdk's serialization mechanism directly. for anything that is not a bit stream (binary, xml,..), there's a standard way to handle serialization that is: 5ec8ef588b
